主要论点: Does practice make perfect?

You know the old phrase, "Practice makes perfect." That may not always be true. According to a recent study published in Royal Society Open Science, there are other factors for reaching elite (最优秀的) levels of ability.

The researchers set out to replicate (复制) the process of a now-famous 1993 study of top-level violinists and pianists. On average, the earlier study found that top-ranked musicians had clocked over 10,000 hours of practice by the age of 20. It put their success down to the hours spent practicing, downplaying the importance of natural talent, learning skills and other factors.

Practice can take you pretty far, but it's only one part of success. CFP

Author Malcolm Gladwell later relied on this study for his 2008 book, Outliers. He called 10,000 hours "the magic number of greatness".

Questioning this conclusion, Brooke Macnamara and Megha Maitra, from Case Western Reserve University in Ohio, US, sought (寻找) volunteers to put the 10,000-hour rule to the
